Mr. Kemble, in his 'Saxons in England,' vol. ii. page 203, A. D. 1849, says—'The proper [Anglo-] Saxon name for these assemblies was Witena gemōt, literally the meeting of the witan [or the wise or experienced]; but we also find,—Micel gemōt the great meeting; Sinoplic gemōt the synodal meeting; Seonop the synod. The Latin names are Concilium, Conventus, Synodus, Synodale conciliabulum, and the like. Although synodus and seonop might more properly be confined to ecclesiastical conventions, the Saxons do not appear to have made any distinction; probably because ecclesiastical and secular regulations were made by the same body, and at the same time. . . . It is very probable that the . . . system of separate houses for the clergy and laity prevailed . . . , and that merely ecclesiastical affairs were decided by the king and clergy alone. It is probable that even in strictly ecclesiastical synods, the king had a presidency at least, as head of the church in his dominions, Cod. Dipl. 116; A. D. 767; Kmb. i. 142, 143. There are some acts [of the Witena Gemōt], in which the signatures are those of clergymen only, others in which the clerical signatures are followed and, as it were, confirmed by those of the laity; and in one remarkable case of this kind, the king signs at the head of each list, as if he had in fact affixed his mark successively in the two houses, as president of each.' See above, Cod. Dipl. 116. Se cyng hæfde ðær [MS. ðæs] on morgen witena gemōt on the morrow the king [Edward] had there a meeting of the wise, Chr. 1052; Erl. 181, 9. II. for the passages in which the word occurs as a technical term in the laws, see Thorpe, index to vol. i. of 'Ancient Laws and Institutes,' s. v. Schmid, p. 585, arranges the several 'griths' under the following heads:—(1) Place; churches, private houses, the king's palace and precincts; (2) Time; fasts and festivals, coronation days, days of public gemots and courts, times when the fyrd is summoned; (3) Persons; clergy, widows, and nuns. On this word, Stubbs, i. 181, says—The grith is a limited or localized peace, under the special guarantee of the individual, and differs little from the protection implied in the mund or personal guardianship which appears much earlier; although it may be regarded as another mark of territorial development. When the king becomes the lord, patron, and mundborh of his whole people, they pass from the ancient national peace of which he is the guardian into the closer personal or territorial relation of which he is the source. The peace is now the king's peace; . . . the frith is enforced by the national officers, the grith

by the king's personal servants: the one is official, the other personal; the one the business of the country, the other that of the court. The special peace is further extended to places where the national peace is not fully provided for: the great highways . . . are under the king's peace.' [A. R. IN Anglo-Saxon the letter h represents the guttural aspirate and the pure spirant. In later English the guttural h is generally represented by gh, e. g. leóht light, heah high. Under certain circumstances h takes the place of c and g, see those letters. In some cases it is dropped, e. g. bleo for bleoh; seon, p. seah; nabbā = ne habban. In the Northumbrian specimens the use of the initial h, especially in the combinations hl, hn, hr, is uncertain, e. g. eorta = heorta, haald = ald, hlif = lif, lysta = hlysta, hnætt = nett, nesc = hnesc, hræst = ræst, hræfn = hræfn. The name of the Runic letter was hægl hail:—Hægl byþ hwitust corna, Runic pm. 9; Kmbl. 341, 4; the forms accompanying the poem and given by Kemble are these, H, H.

-hām, es; m. 'The Latin word which appears most nearly to translate it is vicus, and it seems to be identical in form with the Greek κώμη. In this sense it is the general assemblage of the dwellings in each particular district, to which the arable land and pasture of the community were appurtenant, the home of all the settlers in a separate and well defined locality, the collection of the houses of the freemen. Whenever we can assure ourselves that the vowel is long, we may be certain that the name implies such a village or community,' Cod. Dipl. Kmbl. iii. xxviii-ix. The distinction between -ham and -hām seems to have been lost before the Norman Conquest, as in the Chronicle one MS. has tō Buccingahamme, another tō Buccingahām, 918; Th. i. 190, col. i, 2, l. 21. [Icel. -heimr, e. g. Álf-heimr the abode of the elves: O. H. Ger. -heim.]

hamele, hamule, an; f. An oar-loop, but the word occurs only in a phrase, which may be borrowed from the Scandinavian. Icel. hamla an oar-loop, is used in the phrase, til hömlu = per man [v. Cl. and Vig. Dict.], and apparently with the same meaning we get Chr. 1039; Erl. 167, 15, 21:—On his dagum man geald xvi scipan æt ælcere hamulan viii marc eall swā man ær dyde on Cnutes cynges dagum . . . Ðā hī gerædden ðet man geald lxii scipan æt ælcere hamelan viii marc in his days sixteen ships were paid, eight marks to each of the crew, just as before was done in king Cnut's days . . . Then they decided that sixty-two ships should be paid, to each man eight marks. William of Malmesbury says twenty marks were paid to the soldiers of each vessel, ii. 12. Florence of Worcester, Chr. 1040, says eight marks to each rower, and twelve to the steersman, 'octo marcas unicuique suæ classis remigi et xii unicuique gubernatori præcepit dependi.'

[In later English the Northern dialect is first found adopting the forms which in Modern English have replaced the oldest, and the innovation gradually spread. Thus while the Northumbrian Metrical Psalter (before 1300) has þai, þair, þam in the plural, the declension in Piers P. is hij and þei, here, hem; and these forms with the exception of hij, are used by Wiclif and Chaucer. So with she for heó, which is still preserved in the Lancashire hoo. Amongst the cognate dialects the O. Frs. is that which agrees best with English. v. Hilfenstein, Comparative Grammar, p. 193.]

heáh-geréfa, an; m. A high reeve, reeve of high rank. Kemble, Saxons in England, ii. 156, observes of this word, 'It is a name of very indefinite signification, though not of very rare occurrence. It is obvious that it really denotes only a reeve of high rank, I believe always a royal officer; but it is impossible to say whether the rank is personal or official; whether there existed an office called heáhgeréfscepe having certain duties; or whether the circumstance of the shire or other reeve being a nobleman in the king's confidence gave to him this exceptional title. I am inclined to believe that they are exceptional, and perhaps in some degree similar to the Missi of the Franks, officers dispatched under occasional commissions to perform functions of supervision, hold courts of appeal, and discharge other duties, as the necessity of the case demanded; but that they are not established officers found in all the districts of the kingdom, and forming a settled part of the machinery of government.' H. 11, 7, 10; Th. i. 521, 5, 10; 76, 6; Th. i. 582, 4. Schmid A. S. Gesetze, p. 609, suggests a different origin from that given by Thorpe, 'Es liegt nahe, an die Berechnung der Verwandtschaftsgrade nach den Gliedern des menschlichen Leibes zu denken, wo dann die nächsten Verwandten, die auf den Halsfang Anspruch haben, in den Hals zu stehen kommen könnten, und damit hängt vielleicht Zusammen, dass die Gradberechnungen nicht von dem gemeinschaftlichen Stammvater, sondern dessen Kindern beginnen, sodass die nächststehenden Verwandten als binnan cneówe befindlich bezeichnet werden konnten.' But while this explanation might suit the circumstances described in the passage given above, from Edmund's Laws, it would not be applicable in the earlier passage from Wihtræd's Laws. Schmid seems to refer the penalty, in its origin, too exclusively to cases of killing: 'Eine Geldbusse, die bei einer Tödtung in Verbindung mit dem Wergeld an die nächsten Verwandten des Getödteten gezahlt werden musste, die aber auch sonst zur Bestimmung der Grösse einer Busse genannt wird.' [Cf. Icel. hals-fang; n. embracing: hals-fengja to embrace.]

III. prison, confinement, durance. Schmid, p. 609, suggests a connection between this meaning and that g'ven under I. in the following remark: 'Die grammatische Bedeutung des Wortes führt darauf, dass ursprünglich darunter das Anhängen an einen Block oder das Einspannen in den Stock, als die Art der Sicherung eines Gefangenen, der man sich bediente, wenn Gefängnisse fehlten, verstanden worden sei.' Accordingly he translates the following passage, L. Alf. pol. 35; Th. i. 84, 4:—Gif hē hine on hengen [MS. B. hengen] ællegec 'wenn er ihn in den Stock legt,' which Thorpe renders if he lay him in prison. In the latter sense it is found L. C. S. 35; Th. i. 396, 27:—Gif fréondleás man swā geswenced weorpe ðæt hē borh næbbe ðonne gebūge hē hengen [MS. higan. v. hycgan.

hīd, e; f. A hide of land. The form hīged, which occurs Cod. Dipl. Kmbl. ii. 5, 25, seems to shew that the word is connected with hiwan, higan, and this etymology is supported by the use of familia and hīd in the Latin and English versions respectively of Bede's Ecclesiastical History. The original meaning of the word would thus be 'as much land as will support one family.' v. Bd. 1, 25; S. 486, 19; 2, 9; S. 87, 32 [Latin]: 3, 4; S. 106, 33 [Latin]: 4, 16; S. 584, 14. Further, in the charters, hīwice [q. v.] is used as equivalent to hīd. The Latin words used as equivalent are mansus, mansa, mansio, manens, cassatus, terra tributarii, familia, Cod. Dipl. Kmbl. iii. xxx. See for further discussion of the word Kemble's Saxons in England, i. 4; Stubbs' Const. Hist. s. v; Schmid. A. S. Gesetze, p. 610.

hrēman. v. hrýman. [From the meaning the word would seem to correspond to O. Sax. hrōman: O. H. Ger. hrōmian, hruomian gloriari, jactare; but the adjective hrēmig, hrēmig, though especially in the compound sige-hrēmig it agrees in meaning with the O. Sax. hrōmag: O. H. Ger. hrōmag, hruomag gloriosus: siguhrōmlīh triumphalis, points to a connection with the noun hrēam: the verb is therefore given under hrýman, the most usual form under which the verb connected with hrēam in form and meaning occurs.]

hreōw; adj. In Andr. Kmbl. 2233; An. 1118 the alliteration seems to require reōw. In the compounds blōd-, wæl-hreōw the second syllable seems to be hrehō [or is it reōw, or may hreōw be a confusion of the two forms?], as the form hrehōh does not occur independently in the sense of fierce. Grein separates hreoðh [hreoðw] under two heads with the meanings sævus, mæstus, but this seems unnecessary, as the idea of mental disturbance may be derived from that of physical disturbance in hreoðh, q. v. see also hreoðe. However, as Ettmüller, p. 504, observes, perhaps the three forms hreoðh, hreoðw, hreoðu are sometimes confounded.

hrind. A word of doubtful meaning occurring in the following passage, 'Nis ðæt feor heonon ðæt se mere standeþ ofer ðæm hongiaþ hrinde bearwas wudu wyrutum fæst wæter oferhelmaþ,' Beo. Th. 2731; B. 1363. Thorpe translates barky, Kemble rinded, but in this case there should be no initial h. In Ælf. Gl. 59; Som. 68, 5, 6; Wrt. Voc. 38, 56, 57 hrind translates caudex vel codex, and liber is translated seó inre hrind, but perhaps the better reading for the former would be rind=cortex. Otherwise hrinde bearwas might be [?] 'groves with [large-] stemmed trees.' Grein compares the word with forms given by Halliwell rind frozen to death, rinde to destroy, and suggests dead; Heyne takes hrinde = hrinende and compares with Icel. hrina sonare. Might hrinde = hringde in the sense 'placed in a ring or circle,' so that hrinde bearwas would be the trees placed round or encircling the mere?

hring, in the phrase wopes hring occurs four times, in poems by the same author:—Ðā cwom wopes hring þurh ðæs beornes bréost blāt út fān weoll waduman stream, Andr. Kmb. 2558; An. 1281. Ðā was wopes hring hāt heáfodwylm ofer hleor goten nalles for torne teáras feollon, Elen. Kmb. 2262; El. 1132. Ðær was wopes hringorne bitolðen wæs seó treówlufu hāt æt heortan hreðre innan weoll, Exon. 15 b; Th. 34, 5; Cri. 537. Him ðæs wopes hringorne gemonade teagor yðum weoll hāte heáfodropan, 52 a; Th. 182, 21; Gû. 1313. The meaning given by Grein, sonus [cf. hringan], does not seem to suit the context very well, which, as in the second passage, where the phrase appears equivalent to hāt heáfodwylm, points to shedding tears as the idea to be conveyed. Grimm explains fletus intensissimus, quasi circulatim erumpens, And. u. El. p. 130, and this seems to give the meaning though the connection with hring is not very evident.

The Latin centum shews a similar modification.] v. next word.

hund- as a prefix to numerals from 70 to 120 is a shortened form of the word which appears in Gothic as tēhund, taihund [v. preceding word], and may be explained decade. O. Sax. prefixes ant [= hund?], in O. Frs. the prefix is t, and a trace of such forms is yet left in the Modern Dutch t-achtig=80. On these numerals March remarks 'Gothic has sibun-tēhund. The Anglo-Saxon form was once hund-seofonta [decade seventh], like O. Sax. ant-sibuntā. The -ta changed to -tig through conformation with the smaller numbers, and hund-, whose meaning had faded, was retained as a sign of the second half of the great hundred,' Grammar, p. 75. See also Helfenstein's Comparative Grammar, p. 279. For the great hundred [120] cf. Icel. tólfrætt hundráð as distinguished from lítrætt hundráð. See Cl. and Vig. Dict. hundráð.
